The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday upheld a Norfolk federal judge's ruling striking down Virginia's ban on same-sex marriage — saying that “denying same-sex couples this choice prohibits them from participating fully in our society.”

A three-member panel of the court voted 2-1 to uphold U.S. District Judge Arenda L. Wright Allen's February ruling striking down a 2006 state constitutional amendment and other long-standing laws limiting marriage to one man and one woman.

Wright Allen's ruling, made with the backing of Attorney General Mark Herring, was the most significant inroads same-sex marriage proponents have made in the Old South. The ruling declared that the state's ban violates federal constitutional provisions on equal protection and due process of law.

On Monday, the appeals court agreed. “We recognize that same-sex marriage makes some people deeply uncomfortable,”

A throng of reporters, photographers and cameramen followed the governor and his legal team, but he had little to say. “Glad we got the jury picked, and looking forward to starting the defense tomorrow,” he said.

As the pack rounded a corner outside the federal courthouse, Maureen McDonnell was able to leave with less attention.

Jury selection took nearly eight hours Monday. Then, just as the jury seemed set, one woman begged off, citing family concerns. She was replaced with the first alternate, and U.S. District Court Judge James R. Spencer said he plans to give the jury of
